Culture shock is an experience people have when they move to a foreign country with a new cultural environment, which is different from their own. These unfamiliar surroundings lead to a feeling of being a little bit lost. There are many symptoms of transition shock including: anger, eating disturbance and excessive critical reactions to host culture.

People experiencing culture shock usually move through four stages; they will initially have the honeymoon stage which is characterised by a positive feeling. Then there will be the frustration stage, it may be marked by rejection of the new culture, as well as romanticising one's home culture. But then, with some time and perhaps help from locals, people will start the adjustment stage and begin to feel more familiar and comfortable with the new environment. Adaption and acceptance is the final stage which contributes to the successful integration.

In fact, there is no magic solution for dealing with culture shock. Everyone has to find his or her own balance between the values of home country and those of the host country. This experience shapes one's personality and gives an invaluable lesson that despite our differences, we are all similar and interconnected on this incredibly beautiful planet.

Many black people in Britain feel that they are regularly discriminated. Unemployment is higher among Blacks than among Whites, and black pupils do not do as well at school as Whites often because the schools that they go to do not have high academic reputations.

Though there has been no serious violence in Black districts of British cities for over twenty years, people have not forgotten the violence that occurred in several British cities in the 80's. Even today, there is often tension just under the surface in parts of London, where poverty, unemployment and other social problems are high, and confidence in the police is very low.

Plenty of projects have been started, to provide jobs and training to young Blacks in the poorest parts of the cities. Some have been very successful, and lots of Black teenagers do well at school, then go to university or do something else interesting, and become successful. Today's British teenagers, whether they are Black, White or anything else, have been through the same school system, they eat the same food, they watch the same television or films. In short, most people in today's Britain do not judge other people by the colour of their skin.
